Fugitive Warlord Carlos Castano: More Than a Mercenary? rughtive warlord Carlos Castano: More Than a Mercenary?
Paramilitary leader Carlos Castano Gil appears to be trying to cloak his notorious outlaw persona with some political legitimacy. Despite the $1 million government bounty on his head, Castano has recently conducted press interviews to explain the actions of—and possibly to cultivate a legitimate political image for—his Peasant Self-Defense Group of Cordoba and Uraba (ACCU), Colombia's largest and most widely feared paramilitary force.  Castano—who has been described by journalists as a "short, surprisingly normal-looking" 32-year-old—has cleverly manipulated his media image to strike a chord with the average citizen's disgruntlement over the decades-long war, claiming that his troops are not ruthless killers but men with principles and fellow victims of the insurgency. According to press reports, Castano has also tried to maneuver for a role in any peace process, maintaining that the paramilitaries have been a strong force throughout the war and should be involved in its resolution.  the warlord's strategic paramilitary goal is to control all of northern Colombia.
Some journalists speculate that Castano's fight against the guerrillas may be motivated, at least in part, by revenge. Nine siblings have been killed in the insurgency, and, according to press reports, he and a now-deceased brother started the ACCU shortly after guerrillas kidnapped and killed their father. Castano—who travels with several well-armed bodyguards—fearing for his wife and young child, he is exploring the possibility of getting his family out of Colombia.
The lure of illicit financial gain also plays a role in Castano's paramilitary objectives, despite the warlord's public denials. He has been involved in various aspects of the narcotics trade since the late 1980s.
Castano's organization currently provides logistic and security support to traffickers in Valle del Cauca, Antioquia, and Atlantico Departments and that no trafficker can operate within Castano's sphere of influence without his approval.
